A variety of studies have demonstrated that people with phenylketonuria have elevated levels of intramyocellular lipid (IMCL) deposits (i.e., ectopic lipid accumulation) and reduced levels of skeletal muscle mass. However, results of studies in phenylketonuria to determine the relationship between body composition and phenotype are inconclusive. In the present study, the body composition of men with phenylketonuria was assessed. The data indicated that body mass index and fat-free mass were significantly lower in men with the classic presentation of phenylketonuria than in controls. Appendicular lean mass and skeletal muscle mass were also significantly lower in men with the classic phenotype but not in those with mild hyperphenylalaninemia. Fat mass was significantly lower in men with mild hyperphenylalaninemia compared with controls, but there was no difference in fat-free mass or lean mass. The effect of the metabolic control of phenylketonuria on body composition and ectopic lipid accumulation should be further investigated.
